

Volcanos and Ash

Life in Quito is full of ups and down, like the beautiful mountains surrounding it. Cotopaxi, a volcano only 30 miles from where we live, is currently active. It has been threatening to erupt for a while, and is letting off ash and steam.

The eruption is categorized as mild to moderate so far. There is magma rising inside the volcano and the fear is that it will cause a larger eruption if the magma continues to push up to the surface.

We are preparing for the possibility of a larger eruption that would darken the sky with ash. Mudflows could also cut off some of the water and power to Quito.

We have canned foods, water, masks for the ash and candles stored up at home. Fortunately our house is not in a danger zone for lava or mudflows.

Fall on the Equator

Living on the Equator we do not experience the seasons as people farther north or south do. Fall on the equator means the return of the rains here in Quito. This year the rains have come late and are not very heavy so far.

Fall for us means the beginning of school and time for the first play at Alliance Academy. The fall play this year is Twelve Angry Jurors (Men). Emma is juror number 2 and Jacob is helping backstage and running the lights and sound.

This fall we have also begun two new books, in Spanish, with our Sunday and Monday couples' groups. They are "The Four Seasons of Marriage" and "The Digital Invasion".

Finally, fall means that we are making plans for the radio share-a-thon, Misión Compartida that will be December 11-13.

Soccer Excitement

The Ecuadorian soccer team is off to a great start in the qualifiers for the next World Cup. They won their first two games, including an away game against Argentina! The soccer stadium is only about one mile from our house and since our house is on a hill we can see it. The day of the home game against Bolivia we could hear the roar from the stadium whenever Ecuador scored a goal.

Bread People and Purple Juice

In October, many of you think of the harvest, pumpkin pies and apple cider. Here in Ecuador the traditional food at this time of year is guaguas de pan (bread people) and colada morada (purple juice) for the celebration of Día de los Difuntos (Memorial Day).

Bakeries make bread in the shape of little people and fill the bread with jelly, caramel or chocolate. The thick purple juice is made with blackberries, small blueberries, pineapple and various spices. It is usually served hot. We enjoy eating the special bread and enjoy (kind of) drinking the thick juice.
